THE WAR NEWS.

As we predicted, the Rebels, in small force, have done a great deal of mischief in Maryland. The infantry column, which moved up from Frederick to Washington, has crossed the Potomac river, and is now en route to join Lee at Richmond with its spoils and ill-gotten gains of all kinds. This raid has been the best planned and executed of any the Rebels have ever devised yet, and it has failed at all points.

The damage done to our various railroads is very slight, and that done to the citizens was in many instances deserved. It is true we have been insulted in our capital, but the Rebels had to beat a rather hasty retreat without gaining any remarkable advantage.

They are gone, and may they be pursued with that vigor which was brought forward among the people for defense. If an army be sent after them under a good general, they will be destroyed, and Grant will be assisted. If they are left to go free, they will turn and come up the Valley again, or go into Kentucky and make a raid.

They should be followed, and should not be allowed to join either Lee at Richmond, or Morgan in the Valley of Virginia. As for Major Harry Gilmore, we hope that if he is ever taken he may be handed over to General Sherman, who is the only man who knows how to deal with Rebels.

From General Grant's Army we have the good news that all is progressing favorably. The Weldon Railroad, just repaired by the Rebels, has been again destroyed by our troops.

Reports from General Sherman are most cheering. He has probably taken Atlanta, and destroyed Johnston's Rebel army. His campaign has been everywhere brilliant and successful.

General Foster has been worrying the Rebels about Charleston considerably of late. He has gained small successes on John's and James' Islands recently with very small losses.

There is a report on the street that the pirate Florida has been captured, but we cannot trace it to any respectable source.

THE OTHER SEX.

Woman, if we regard her in a chivalric spirit, is the crowning beauty of our life. Her gentle influence, graceful accomplishments, and singular capability of diffusing happiness, help us amazingly over the rugged road we are all traveling. So, if we are gentlemen, we give up our seas in the railway car, or the pew to her, with earnest pleasure. We knock down her insular. We puff our offensive cigar-smoke in a contrary direction, unless she positively asserts that she delights in the aroma of the salacing weed.

We devote all our muscular energies and our superior knowledge of men and things to her delectation, glad enough to receive in exchange her smile and gratitude. This is as it should be. No matter how vehemently certain viragos contend that they are quite capable of taking care of themselves, without any dependence on the male species, they cannot bluster all true men out of the old faith in woman's weakness. We have an idea that if FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE should appear in one of those agitated assemblies of infatuated females who are determined to believe that they are woefully wronged, the tattered and oratorical feminines would be afraid of her and shrink from her presence.

If you are a man with a true heart, you have often helped to celebrate "Dear Woman." You have such respect for her that you wish to see her so much better than your poor self that you can worship her. You wish her to be good and useful, and very naturally; for you know that you will be made a better and a wiser man by her bright example. If a pure and sincere woman cannot allure a man into the right way, divines and moralizing philosophers may try in vain. But we are afraid that the young women of our great cities are not so lovable as earnest men would wish to see them.

We will not take that intensely utilitarian view of the sex which condemns them as utterly worthless, because they cannot bake bread or broil a steak. This is the overbearing insolence of the "lord of creation," and not the feeling of the true knight, who is always willing to work hard enough to exempt his lady from coarse labor. But, then, must not our fair friends themselves admit that they are hardly fitted for useful lives? Are they not drumming too much on the piano, and dancing too many cossichons and waltzes, and spending too much time with mottos and minstrels?

Is there not a plausibility in the supposition that they refit too many lackadaisical romances, and pay too much attention to their complexion, and too little to their intellects? Coquetry is very charming just now, while their faces are unwarmed and their movements zephyr-like. The delicious music elicited from pianos, or gushing from their rosy mouths, will do very well this year, and next, and next. They may float through the waltz this summer and next winter, and not tire themselves nor the lookers-on for several successive seasons.

But what, after awhile, when they begin to encounter some of the roughness of life's journey; when their little figures grow portly and shapes; when their fingers refuse to glide over the keys with their old sprightliness, and dancing becomes laborious and painful? When the brief day of careless pleasure has fled, will they have anything to fall back upon which will make life not a burden? Do our young ladies know that there actually exists quite a community of young men afraid to get married? They know it will be the very thing for them. But they get only moderate salaries, and want good plain girls, who will be sufficiently attractive to keep them away from the club. And they can't find them. They dare not risk a proposal to the young women they meet at the parties, adorned with flattery they could not pay for, should they devote their revenue for one whole year to that exclusive purpose. Their case is a sad one. We should like to see an improvement in the young ladies, if only for the sake of these unpleasantly situated young gentlemen. Shall we ever meet a FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE at the opera, or be introduced to her at a select party?
